Improved borrowing structure for US Treasury

London, 28 October 2010

The US Treasury has used lower interest rates to improve the structure of its borrowing with a rise in the proportion of debt held by domestic private investors and a lengthening of maturities, according to Mary Miller, Assistant Secretary for Financial Markets at the US Treasury, writing in the November OMFIF Bulletin.

Other highlights of the November issue include:

-  Yves Mersch, Governor of Banque centrale du Luxembourg, looks critically at latest EU proposals for improved governance of economic and monetary union
-  Sanusi Lamido Sanusi, Governor of Central Bank of Nigeria, outlines his country's efforts to overcome effects of the financial crisis and speed up development
-  Hon Cheung, Director, State Street Global Advisors, examines the burgeoning market for Asian local currency bonds and says they will play a greater role in reserves
-  Darrell Delamaide, Board of Contributing Editors, introduces a new BankNotes feature looking at central banking policy, focusing on the Federal Reserve
-  Ben Simpfordorfer, Chief China Economist, Royal Bank of Scotland, examines prospects for a new Silk Road linking China and the Middle East
-  Paola Subacci and John Nugée, Members of the Advisory Board, urge the US to take the lead in promoting exchange rate cooperation and resolving 'currency wars'
-  Stefan Bielmeier, Head of Research and Chief Economist, DZ Bank, calls on Ireland to borrow from the new European Financial Stability Facility
-  Malan Rietveld, Chief Economist, looks at the favourable prospects for sovereign funds to invest in clean energy
-  William Keegan, Chairman, Board of Contributing Editors, dwells on the new East-West power balance reflected in the annual meetings of the IMF and World Bank
